TRAMPS CAPTURE TRAIN.

Ran In Thirty-Five Miles and Winded Up in Jail.

With clubs for weapons a party of a dozen tramps captured a Reading Railroad company freight train running between Hammond Brook and Trenton the other day and by fusillades of ears of corn, watermelons, potatoes and apples repulsed a force of the company's workmen who tried to retake it.

After the train had been kept going continuously from Belle Meade, where it was captured, to Trenton Junction, a distance of about thirty-five miles, three constables and three policemen, summoned by telegraph, defeated the tramps in a hand to hand fight and took three prisoners. The other nine escaped.

The train was a regular freight from Bound Brook to Trenton, stopping at all stations to take on the produce of the Jersey market gardeners for the Trenton and Philadelphia markets.

When the train came to a halt at Belle Meade the tramps came out of the woods with a whoop. Four of them climbed into the engine cab and five more into the caboose, where were the conductor and three other members of the train crew. The remainder of the tramp squad climbed on top of the cars or into them. Few of the cars were locked because of the stops made at such short distances for taking on freight.

Along the tracks on the way to Trenton Junction the train had to pass at least five gangs of workmen. On approaching any of these gangs of workmen the engineer risked the blow of the engine and slowed the train, while other members of the crew shouted lustily:

"Help us! Tramps have captured the train!"

At no time did any of the gangs of workmen refuse to attempt to recapture the train from the tramps, but every attempt proved futile. Watermelons burst over the heads of the attacking parties; potatoes and hard apples struck them in their eyes and on their noses.

As the train halted at the junction the police rushed aboard. The tramps made a desperate fight against arrest. Two constables and a policeman were knocked unconscious. The clubs of the policemen and constables cut long gashes in the heads of the tramps. The fight lasted for more than fifteen minutes.

Traveling in Morocco.

There are no roads in Morocco except the caravan tracks into the interior. In the best of times they can hardly be called roads, but in the rainy season, when the rivers are swollen and overflow, traveling is both difficult and dangerous.

Woman Kills Big Game.

Few women can boast of killing two tigers, three bears, two panthers and a number of smaller animals. This is the record established by Mrs. James C. Donnet, daughter of John H. Whitehouse, of the Larches, Irvington-on-Hudson, N. Y., says a New York dispatch. Mrs. Donnet went to India some time ago with her husband, who is an officer in the British army, and her surprised and delighted parents have just received from her a letter which shows that their delicately nurtured daughter has been teaching the athletic British girls a few things in the art of killing wild beasts in their native jungle.

Had Ninety Adopted Daughters.

Fritz Adolphy, who died the other day in Arizona, once had ninety adopted daughters, says a St. Louis dispatch. For many years he was proprietor of a famous beer garden in South St. Louis, in which all the attendants were women. Adolphy ignored suggestions from the authorities that his manner of conducting the business was not quite satisfactory. Finally the council passed an ordinance forbidding the serving of drinks by women. Thereupon Adolphy went into the orphan's court with his ninety waitresses and adopted them all. They served him faithfully for many years.
